Water, Water, Everywhere

One day in the winter, clouds start to form in the sky. The clouds get darker. Then it starts to rain. As the air gets colder, the rain turns to snow. Water on the ground turns to ice.

Clouds, rain, snow, ice—how are all these things alike? They are all made of water. Water can take many forms. It can take the shape of anything that holds it. It can change from something wet to something cold and solid. It can melt again to form a puddle. Water can even change to become part of the air. You cannot see it when it is in this form. It can change back again to make tiny drops on the side of a cold glass.

You can make water change form, too. Just put some water in the freezer. Check it in a few hours. It turns to ice. Leave it out for a while. It will melt once again. Where can you see water?

1. What comes first according to the story?

2. What picture shows water after you put it in the freezer for a few hours?

The Squeaky Wheel

Squeak, squeak, squeak. Bob, the pet mouse in Mrs. Wynn's kindergarten room, was very noisy. Bob liked to run on his wheel all day long, and all day long the wheel squeaked.

Mrs. Wynn said, "Children, Bob is too noisy. I'm afraid he'll have to go."

The children were sad. They liked to pet Bob. They liked to feed him.

Ruth raised her hand. She asked, "Could we put on our thinking caps? Maybe we can find a way to fix the problem."

Pete said, "We could get more toys. Then maybe Bob would play with something else."

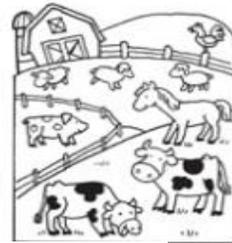

Bree said, "We could cover the window near his cage with black construction paper. Then Eek would think it was night. Maybe he would sleep."

Then Ruth raised her hand. She said, "When we have something squeaky at home, my mom puts oil on it."

Mrs. Wynn said, "It's worth a try." She put oil on the squeaky wheel. The children waited. Bob ran on the wheel. It was quiet!

"Ahhh," said Mrs. Wynn, "peace at last!"
